ABOUT DONNE

DONNE is a charitable foundation that is here to make a positive change in the fight against gender inequality within the music industry. Our main goal is to celebrate, advance, and amplify women in music so that they are seen, heard, and appreciated for their talent so they can leave a legacy of inspiration for future generations.

Executive Summary

100 orchestras
from 27 countries

This latest research by Donne - Women in Music has been prepared to get a better understanding of how classical music is responding to the current and very important issue of equality and diversity in concert's repertoire worldwide. It builds on previous research carried out in 2018/2019 and 2019/2020. The new results presented here were determined by in-depth analysis of composers' works scheduled for the 2020-2021 season in 100 orchestras from 27 countries.

The results show that only 11.45% of the scheduled concerts worldwide included compositions by women. 88.55% included solely compositions written by men.

There has been a small improvement on the overall inclusion of works by women in concerts compared with previous years. But, when we look closely at the numbers, it is a different matter.

Only 747 out of the 14,747 compositions scheduled by the 100 orchestras throughout the 2020-2021 season, were composed by women – a total of 5%.

One alarming fact is that only 1.11% of the pieces were composed by Black & Asian women and only 2.43% by Black & Asian men.

Data showing the individual results for each orchestra are included in the next few pages.

Why is this important right now?

The COVID-19 pandemic has left devastating consequences across the music industry. Under these circumstances it can be easy to forget and so not prioritise equality and diversity. But, we believe it is now more important than ever to pay attention to these inequalities, or risk devastating consequences across gender, race and class in music for generations.

For equality and diversity to become a reality in our concert halls, it is important that we move beyond tokenism for political correctness and aim for comprehensive and genuine inclusivity to permeate through the layers - that means the artists we see on stage, the repertoire presented in concerts and in our educational syllabuses, the personnel leading organisations and the audiences we are trying to reach.

For centuries, music has been a symbolic glue connecting society and bringing people together irrespective of background. Music is a powerful instrument of social change. More than ever, our stages and concert halls need to be places of inspiration and inclusion, opening doors to all, irrespective of gender, race and class.

We are a long way from an ideal world, as is shown by the numbers. This research aims to raise awareness and open up conversations to see how we together can make a difference. It is only through collaboration with others who share our values and ambitions that we can make this important shift. This is an invitation to reflection and immediate action.

Next time someone tells you that inequality in music is a problem of the past, don't trust what you think you know, check the numbers instead.

Get in touch if you want to be part of making a real positive impact for equality and diversity in music.

Methodology

This research contains data analysis of 100 orchestras from 27 countries in regard to programming works by women composers as well as accounting for the representation of Black & Asian composers.

Mainstage orchestral concerts were analysed. Gala concerts, touring and family concerts were included when the information available included a full programme of the pieces performed. Chamber music concerts were included if they were performed by members of the orchestra.

Anonymous and traditional pieces were considered when the name of the composer responsible for the arrangement was clearly stated.

Information was compiled from the orchestra's official websites and press releases, and included the most up-to-date information between March and May 2021. Original season brochures and digital concert season brochures were the preferred options for data collection. When orchestras did not have complete season overviews listed at the time of website access, the data available was taken into consideration.

The research shows the number of scheduled performances per orchestra and how many of them included pieces by women composers. It also shows the total number of compositions by women - with separated results for Black and Asian women - and total number of compositions by men, with separated results for Black and Asian men.

This research is the latest in a series of research publications by Donne, Women in Music. Whilst previous research was solely focused on gender, after the anniversary of the murder of George Floyd on 25 May and the Black Lives Matter protests, as well as the increasing hate crimes towards the Asian community during the pandemic, we decided to add this analysis to this year's report. Still, there are many more layers to genuine ethnically diverse representation in the industry. We look forward to continuing to improve the scope, scale and rigour of our research in the years to come, and to advocate for equality and diversity in music.

Why is it important for the music industry to have equality and diversity as a goal?

It is important to have diversity across all walks of life; it's better for ensuring everyone has an equal opportunity at their dreams, that everyone feels valued, it definitely makes better business sense and it's better for creativity. In fact the question should be - why wouldn't the music industry want all of those things?

Vick Bain

Author | Founder of The F-List

If we want the music industry to thrive, to retain and to grow its audiences, we need to ensure that those who produce, create and perform music represent the diversity of our communities. Equality of access, where music-learning and participation is open to everyone, regardless of background, generates energy and passion, and allows the music we love to continue its importance and vitality in our society. Music belongs to us all.

Dr. Kadiatu Kanneh-Mason

Author | Public Speaker

There is such a wealth of music out there that deserves to be heard – broadening the range of music we see and hear can only enrich everybody's musical experience. Too many young composers give up not because of lack of talent, but because they face too many barriers to opportunity including entrenched perceptions of what a 'proper composer' looks like. Embracing equality, diversity and inclusion means that a broader range of talent can flourish, which is essential for the future of music.

Susanna Eastburn

MBE - Chief Executive Sound and Music

We believe that the success of the music we fund is driven by the diversity of the people who create it. Underrepresentation and discrimination in music are huge issues. Audiences and music creators deserve a stronger and fairer music ecosystem for all. Through targeted programmes including Keychange and POWER UP, we advocate for meaningful change and encourage companies, organisations and individuals to make themselves accountable so that everyone is given the opportunity to progress without barriers relating to gender, race, disability, sexuality or economic background.

Joe Frankland

CEO, PRS Foundation

Music can enliven and empower us all. But people are less inclined to engage with it if they don't see themselves in it. That risks marginalising and diminishing something that ought to be universally cherished. History's done a brilliant job of making us think classical music is white and male. It's not. There is so much wonderful repertoire past and present by underrepresented composers every bit as good as the established masters. It's not just our responsibility to excavate and share it: there's immense joy and reward in discovering such treasure.

James Murphy

Chief Executive, Royal Philharmonic Society

I could think of a thousand reasons - but first, let's turn the question on its head: Why does the music industry work to to actively exclude people? Because it's easier? Because we're afraid? Because we're lazy?... So what does it say about us?

Ella Jarman-Pinto

Film, TV & Concert Composer

The music industry is constantly shifting, with power and agency being transferred from monolithic corporations to individual artists. There are numerous studies about the business case for diversity, which prove that companies who place equality and diversity at the core of what they do, are more likely to outperform those who do not (McKinsey, 2020). Outside of the business case, the affects of seeing oneself represented in different areas of the music industry, while somewhat unquantifiable, are unequivocally essential.

Nate Holder

Saxophonist | Author | Music Education Consultant

We can't delay this any longer. Some of us performers are trying our hardest to bring some light to all this vast amount of works that have been neglected by the mere fact of being written by women. It is of utmost priority that the programmers behind big music halls and symphony orchestras put their trust in that this wonderful repertoire in the shadows will work for audiences! Give it to them and you will see the results! Audiences are keen. Performers are keen. Please join the team effort once and for all!

Antonio Oyarzabal

Pianist

They said that their music was universal, but the music they played was only from one tiny corner of the universe. They said our music was too political, but we didn't look at all like their politicians. So if we are too political for the concert hall and too artistic for the debating chamber, where in the universe do we sit?

If we continue to programme the same pieces for the rest of eternity, we are consigning the concert hall to be a museum, but even museums reckon with their past through the eyes of the present, and reframe the biases which have bought their exhibits. How wonderful that these concert halls can also reverberate with new music, and how gaping a hole is left by the music that is unheard, unplayed, uncommissioned.

Anna Appleby

Composer

Music thrives if listeners feel there is something in it to which they can respond, or that sounds/looks/feels relevant; this is how music creates communities. Creative arts have a capacity to bypass prejudices and barriers, and we urgently need to find ways to have conversations across social/political/geographical divides. The more diverse the voices in music - as performers, composers, promoters, audiences - the richer and stronger these conversations and communities will be.

Laurie Strass

Professor, Musician, Musicologist

Music is the universal language of the world, and it's community should be a reflection of the people who create and enjoy that language.

Leslie Kwan

Harpsichordist | Founder and Managing Director, Lionsgate Music

I consider equality and diversity in music as essential goals. For instance, it is relevant to recognize the quality of women's work, as well as their history. Frequently, their works are not even considered because they are women. It is important to change the way the music industry and press still handle tradition and new opportunities with equality in such a way that space is not an exception for minorities - it is very tiring to see the recurrence of prominence by the press when works are written by people outside the "normal standard" as "new", "pioneers" or "exception".

Opening more opportunities is a great way of encouraging new generations to be aware of the values of diversity. The musical canon must offer possibilities for us to see in the diversity of works a favorable point of wealth for everyone in the future. This starts on the level of the first steps on musical training, where more works by Women, Black, and Asian people should be offered for interpreters to have more access and awareness to it. I truly believe that all spheres should work with this purpose, musicologists, producers, interpreters, music teachers can all be achieved in a short period of time.

Andrea Botelho

Conductor

Music has the ability to heal, inspire, connect and create real positive change in the world. For far too long, talented women - especially women of colour - have faced enormous challenges getting into the music industry and receiving the opportunities they deserve. A music industry in which not everyone is represented ultimately results in a world where fans may not feel represented. Now is the time for allies in the music industry, from artists to producers to songwriters, to ask themselves "who is missing from around the table and the recording studio?" and take concrete steps to ensure inclusion at every level.

Sara Vaughan

Innovator, Creator Brands with Purpose, Positive Change Maker, Global Chief Purpose & Sustainability Advisor Marie Claire and Host of The Start Somewhere Podcast

Inclusion is not only for the sake of diversity and pluralism. Most of all it is a matter of basic human rights. Yes, women, minorities, people of color are all part of humanity, but they are still being excluded from the centers of power and from specific professions in the music industry.

Talia Ilan

Conductor

Creativity and talent are democratic, they do not choose genders or nationalities or sexual orientation. Therefore we should learn how to be more adventurous in our exploration of repertoires and composers, and learn to find what we like outside the accepted cannon. There is so much out there, it is a crime to focus on a narrow part of the repertoire, or stick largely to what we know.

Anastasia Belina

Musicologist | Writer | Presenter

Because it will enrich not only our programming and give us, performers, a wider selection of works to present to our audiences, but also enrich our understanding of creative heritage. Because we live in a diverse world, and as artists, we delight in the multitude of things life offers us, so we should delight in a broader range of musical works we can perform.

Peter Jablonski

Pianist

It is absolutely crucial for the music industry to have radical diversity and access justice as its aims. It is embarrassing for us all that this conversation is still being had; it is clear that broader, more imaginative programming is more fulfilling for performers and audiences alike, and that it is the only thing that will genuinely ensure the future of both music making and music appreciation. If organisations want a rich and thriving musical future, they need to make radical steps now to diversify their programming - in terms of historical provenance of works, composer demographics, but more broadly in terms of what they conceive of as an orchestral season.

Joanna Ward

Composer | Performer

We need our musical society - our cultural workforce if you will - to reflect our society as a whole, which is naturally diverse and broad. There shouldn't be any barriers to talent - gender, race, sexual orientation or disability.

Amy Bebbington

Conductor | Choir Specialist | Teacher

Gender equality on the concert stage is democracy - all voices must have the same time on stage in a modern society.

Sofia Sahlin

Chair KVASt - Swedish Association of Women Composers

Because we are missing so many great listening opportunities. I know some want their "canon" composers, but outside this musical mainstream there are so many great works waiting for musicians to play them. Tania León's Pulitzer is just the tip of the iceberg. What I do hope is that the Titanic Canon will sink so that we finally say goodbye to the Gatekeepers of the past. What we need is a new generation of Gatekeepers having in mind a balance that focus more on diverse living composers.

Michelle Monette

CKIA FM | Quebec

How can we do better?

We need to think more about what lies behind lack of representation in programmes.

At Sound and Music we have found it hugely helpful to reflect (with others as well) on the barriers that many composers face. This has led us to launch the Fair Access Principles which aim to offer good practice guidance in how to run inclusive selection processes. Transparency about data can be dismissed as being boring but it is essential as it enables organisations to be held to account and shows how their words translate into action. Thanks to Donne / Women in Music for bringing this information together.

Susanna Eastburn MBE

Chief Executive Sound and Music

Research informed inquiry is important to understand where the inequalities begin, and how they widen, shift or stop from sector to sector. It is also salient to understand the power of collective bargaining in order to ask for change, or seek to create the spaces, events and conversations we need for our own communities.

Nate Holder

Saxophonist | Author | Music Education Consultant

While the classical music community gets on well, we each tend to hoard our discoveries to keep some sort of market edge. Far more we need to share the names of composers and works that deserve to be heard, giving others the insight, assurance and confidence to programme them too. We also need to encourage audiences that music is all about discovery and put their faith in our musicians to take them to exciting new vistas they've not yet seen.

James Murphy

Chief Executive, Royal Philharmonic Society

We need to better understand where the gaps are, where discrimination is being played out, then we can start to address that. In music we know more women need supported in professional creative music roles such as having greater publishing support for composers and greater label support for musicians. Young women need to be encouraged to play instruments not just be singers, and those who are singers need to be valued for their musical talent, not just what they look like so we remove the double-standards that exist between male and female musicians. And then festivals and venue promoters need to ensure their programmes include more female musicians and works by female composers. There are lots of other gaps but those are the major - visible - ones.

Vick Bain

Author | Founder of The F-List

Start with ourselves first. Nothing will change until we own our part in this. There's no shame in admitting our mistakes and learning from them. Take time to rest, find people to work with. It starts with us, but we can't do it alone.

Ella Jarman-Pinto

Film, TV & Concert Composer

Once every one of us finds something new, unexpected, and once our eyes are opened to the vast amount of music beyond what we know, we won't be able to stop discovering. Maybe we should all learn to listen to just one unfamiliar work or a composer a week, and see what it takes us. I hope that more orchestras and performers will join us, but I want to commend those who already do.

Anastasia Belina

Musicologist | Author | Presenter

There are actions/initiatives in different languages, but I did not find a network of all those initiatives. Also, I have found women composers in all part of the world, but for some there are no bios in English (the common language nowadays). Maybe a universal network could include translators. I should add a “vérité de la palice”: for many people if it can't be find on Google, it doesn't exist. So if people search for, say, « women composers », they will miss many « compositoras” (or any other language variations), as I finally realized. Lastly, I have a dream: a universal online place for discovering Women composers and listen to their music

Michelle Monette

CKIA FM - Quebec

Decision-making committees need to be mindful of how to choose the best person for the job in a multi-cultural world and should leave bias, pre-conceived ideas and discrimination at the door. We shouldn't succumb to tokenism but should aim to be representative, fair and transparent.

Amy Bebbington

Conductor | Choir Specialist | Teacher

Sometimes I have the feeling that some discussions point to the inequality in music as a matter of the past – that worries me. Personally, I don't think the matter is past, and researches like yours prove exactly that I am not exaggerating. Just the fact that we are discussing it is already showing advances, but still, equality in music needs a lot of work. How can we do better? Dedicate some time studying works beyond the pre-established canon, thinking about creating more projects where equality is prioritized and opening more spaces for discussion, such as the work carried out by Donne under the direction of Gabriella di Laccio. They need to emerge, so that the subject is less and less treated as a novelty, and more like normalcy.

Andrea Botelho

Conductor

Music education within every school is of critical importance here as music-learning, having access to the spaces where music is performed and heard, creates the musician, the audience member, the manager and the agent. The significant economic and cultural barriers to music have created a music industry that lacks diversity and will also lack vigour and longevity. Those who run and participate in the music industry need to reflect the diversity of our schools and streets.

Dr. Kadiatu Kanneh-Mason

Author | Public Speaker

I think we should just keep including works by diverse composers in our repertoires, and talk to our audiences about them. In my experience, especially in the last 3-4 years, whenever I have done that, audiences responded warmly, and always with great surprise at the richness and beauty of the music they have never heard before. They always asked for more.

Peter Jablonski

Pianist

By setting specific goals and measure the result we will reach equality and diversity. Look at the numbers, statistics, don't measure the feelings you have.

Sofia Sahlin

Chair KVASt - Swedish Association of Women Composers

We can force the musical landscape to change for the better through collective action. Boycott organisations or programming which you don't think is doing enough (and ask your friends to too). Write to heads of organisations en masse. Vocally criticise organisations and don't settle for compromises or a promise of a glacial rate of change. And more importantly, we can make our own new musical landscapes in the shape of our imagined ideal: through our actions as programmers, performers, writers and audiences of music. Ultimately, taking capital (both literal and cultural) away from organisations is the only thing that will change our musical landscape, so that's what we've got to do and we've got to do it now

Be the change

CORPORATE SUPPORTERS

If you are a corporation, donor or patron of the arts, we need your influence and power to change the status quo and the structures that still hold inequality together. We have several exciting partnership opportunities for like-minded brands wishing to lead the way, looking to engage and inspire. All Donne's initiatives contribute to the UN's Sustainable Development Goals \(SDG\) and make a conclusive impact, helping to build a more inclusive, equal and sustainable society. Donne's initiatives support goals 4, 5 and 10.

PROGRAMME & REPERTOIRE CURATING

For arts organisations, orchestras, radio producers, teachers, ensembles and performers who would like to receive tailored advice and suggestions on how to expand their repertoire list and create more diverse programmes and engage their audiences. It is only through collaboration with others who share our values and ambitions that we can make this important shift.

Get in touch if you want to be part of making a real positive impact for equality and diversity in music.

INDIVIDUALS

Check your playlists: are you being inclusive or simply going with what the streaming algorithm suggests to you? Challenge your favourite performers, orchestras, ensembles, radio stations and invite them to be more inclusive. Connect with us and let's help us to spread the word, raise awareness and inspire more people to do the same.
